SOLDIERS ON THE LAND.
An Interesting Experiment.

The question of utilising the services of sick and wounded soldiers on the land during the period of their convalescence has been freely discussed from time to time, and we would direct attention to an interesting experiment that has just been undertaken by Mr. A. C. Evans, Secretary and Superintendent of the Grange Auxiliary Hospital.

He has taken over a quarter of an acre of land from the Corporation at West Worthing for the purpose of cultivation. The sick and wounded inmates of the Grange are helping, and seem quite enthusiastic in the task, which is a novel one to many of them.

About a dozen men are engaged, each of them being able to work for two hours a day; and Mr. Evans assures us he is confident that it would be possible to cultivate at least three acres if only a plough could be obtained to do a little of the rough work.
